The 21st century is an era of globalization, digital technologies, and rapid information flow. In such conditions, properly raising the human personality, especially the younger generation, remains a decisive factor in the sustainable and harmonious development of society. Globalization processes directly affect the education and upbringing system, just as they do every other field. Now the educational process serves not only to transfer knowledge but also to form a modern and independent thinker who is loyal to national and universal values.

From this perspective, the modern teacher appears not only as an instructor but as the main guide in child upbringing and one of the strong pillars of societal development. The teacher is a key person who harmoniously conveys knowledge, upbringing, and values, teaching the new generation not to get lost in a globalized world.

Globalization and child upbringing: opportunities and threats. In the process of globalization, the infinity of information, intercultural influence, and the widespread use of technologies directly affect the child's consciousness. On one hand, this broadens worldview, but on the other hand, it creates the risk of losing national identity [1].

The transformative role of the modern teacher. Today's teacher is not just an instructor but a guide who shapes the child's life path. The teacher actively participates in upbringing through skills such as leadership, communication, empathy, and social responsibility [2].

Pedagogical approaches in the context of globalization. Innovative educational technologies – STEAM, project-based learning, interactive methods – help teachers teach children to think independently and approach problems creatively. These approaches play an especially important role in educating the digital generation [3].

Personal and professional qualities of the modern teacher. The era of globalization demands from teachers such qualities as readiness for constant change, continuous learning, digital literacy, and social activity. They instill in children not only knowledge but also moral standards [4].

The success of child upbringing directly depends on the cooperation between teachers, parents, and society. When this triangle operates with mutual understanding and solidarity, the child receives a well-rounded healthy upbringing [5].

In conclusion, globalization processes require a fundamental renewal of approaches to child upbringing in modern society. In the context of information technologies, intercultural communication, and digital transformation, the teacher's role in properly shaping a child's personality is invaluable. Today's teacher is not just a knowledge provider but a bridge between the modern world and the child, a guide and a promoter of values.

The modern educator stands out not only by living in step with the times but also by being able to find a way to each child's heart. The success of child upbringing primarily depends on the teacher's professional skills, personal qualities, and social responsibility. Therefore, it is appropriate to recognize the modern teacher as the main key to upbringing in the context of globalization.
